Customer Reviews

Of the Dagerman books that I have managed to find in English (a considerable difficulty) this one ranks among the best (I've yet to read A Burnt Child). Dagerman's work is incredibly dark, and the simple vocabulary of the story takes on darkened tones akin to some of the films of Ingmar Bergman (such as Through a Glass Darkly). While heavy usage of metaphor and simile makes Dagerman's style something of a chore to get through, the end is rewarding, in that one gets a clear picture of a lost consciousness trying to interpret the immediate post-war world. In more than one way Dagerman echoes the French existentialists, notably Albert Camus (The Fall). As American film noir of the 1950s expressed the pent-up depression of the 1930s and the post-war confusion of the 1950s in the US, so Dagerman's work appears to confront a country forced into change by external forces.
